shown in pl. xx. Under ordinary circumstances most women wear their hair full-length in this way, but frequently a case (as in pl. xix) is found where the hair is comparatively short. This is due to the custom of cropping the hair on the death of a relative. An example of waviness of the hair is given in the case of the woman shown in the latter plate. The hair in this case is dark-brown. With advancing years the hair tends to become thinner, but no case of even partial baldness was observable either among the men or the women. Throughout life the hair retains its color in almost every instance, but rarely a person is seen who shows a sign of grayness, and one old man was found whose hair was white—it had become thus many years before, though no one knew the cause. No other individual with white or even partially white hair was encountered, and it was claimed by the Indians that the old man referred to was the only individual in the tribe who exhibited this peculiarity. The fact that the hair retains its color so well is probably due to the fact that the Cayapa practically never wear any form of head-covering.

Considerable variations are found in the form of the nose. In some it is wide and rather flat toward its tip, this appearance being due to a considerable distension of the nostrils, the openings of the nostrils being in many cases quite round. However, it escapes completely any approach to the true mongoloid type from the fact that in no case is there such a lack of bridge as is found in the real mongoloid nose. In fact, the contrary is quite the case, and in many instances the bridge is quite high, giving the nose the impression of slight aquilinity.
